

Open Access Research

While reading through this weeks readings i found an annotation written by my fellow classmate dani2496. Found within the Ian Milligan article regarding policy. This annotation stuck out to me for a few reasons.

1. Well written and understandable.
2. Openness to the promising abilities of open access research
3. Understanding that changes will be made to policies

It was compelling to be able to read this comment and not be confused by it. Dani2469 does a wonderful job at breaking down the text and putting it into their own words. By doing this the points made were more persausive. The authors comment shows that they are very open to the various abilities of open access research. It prominently portrayed that they are big fans of how sharing work can have better outcomes. "...attempting to create work that is not just 'mine' but ours" This quote places emphasis on the writers optimistic view regarding open access research. It is undebatable that the writer is for open access research. As i read it became clear that Dani2469 completely understood the implications of using digital resocurses combined with open access research. Making the reader well aware that were to be changes in policy, which usually comes with a new use of technology.

https://hyp.is/RjTiymfhEeemA8s_ViJX8g/ianmilligan.ca/2014/10/23/sshracs

The following links provide a look into the globalization of Open Access Research and the policies that are being implemented world wide.

1. <http://www.carl-abrc.ca/advancing-research/scholarly-communication/open-access/>
2. <https://aoasg.org.au/open-access-policies/>
3. <http://www.rcuk.ac.uk/research/openaccess/policy/>
4. <http://publishers.org/priorities-positions/open-access>